SIXES and SEVENS

by

BARBARA WEBB

This story is written by BARBARA WEBB, a Virginia girl with a number of enthusiasms of modern life to her credit. We invite readers to tell us how they like this story.

Helen looked at her blankly, "Oh ...torry darling.," and rushed back into the thick of the party.

No one paid any attention whatever when Rosamund backed her car out and started townward.

Rosamund found Cindy in a towering rage. "I gots to leave soon," said Cindy. "Shucky nights you-all knows is very special at de big tent. Dey starts singin' early an' by eight dey's shoutin'. I gots to b- dere to shout. You phone yore papa git his suppah down to - An' I ain't got no suppah fer you neither. I'll fix a tray for yore mama, den-lese goin'."

"Did you get the Saturday baking done?" Rosamund asked.

"No'm I didn't. Dat n o count Jackson done went fer the grocery order ten o'clock this mawnin', nev-er come back till one. I can't settle mind on bakin' endurin' revival time."

"I'll fix mother's tray," Rosamund said, "You go along now, Cindy. You'll be in time for all the singing. I'll take care of things here. I'm not going to the dance tonight."

Any other time Cindy would have asked shrill questions, made objections, for she adored Rosamund and loved to hear the details of what the young folks did. But tonight the smell of fine gravy and gravy dashed out of the kitche- in response to the revival urg- which seized her once a year.

Rosamund took a tray to her mother and felt compunction for the feverish smile Mrs. Fleet summoned for the pale-haunted face. Back in the kitche, Rosamund prepared a simple supper for her father, making a mental note of neglected corners in Cindy's kitchen and ice box.

After supper Rosamund surveyed the littered kitchen. "I'm going to clean it up," she decided.

Rosamund washed the dishes, then looked at the clock. "Just seven and a whole evening ahead. Dad will stay with mother till s h e falls asleep. I think I'll bake a cake."

She added cookies and a Spanish cream to her endeavors, for beand ordering a chicken Cindy had done nothing toward Sunday's dinner. "She figured we'd feel sorry for her and go to the Inn," Rosamund thought. "But mother won't be able to go out tomorrow."

She was flushed, flour-streaked, and weary when at half past nine the doorbell took her to the front porch. Bill stood there.

"Missed you at the dance," he said, then, "What on earth have you been doing?"

"Baking spice cookies."

"Well . . ." Bill tottered in mock astonishment.

"Crisis in the family," Rosamund explained, "Revivals, headaches and vanished house-boys. Do you want to take time for a cooky before you go back to the dance?"

Bill did. He sat in the kitchen and ate cookies, drank milk, then dried the accumulation of dishes Rosamund's baking orgy had stacked up. At eleven he went home. He was not, he said, going back to that dance.

Rosamund watched him go. He hadn't tried to kiss her goodnight. H e hadn't said a word beyond friendly companionship, yet she had a deep, satisfied happy feeling, as she went to bed.

Her face in the mirror seemed unchanged. It was a pretty face, which character a n d experience would stamp in time to discontent or a mature beauty.

Rosamund's mother was really ill for two weeks. Cindy was completely disorganized by the revival and the sudden decision of her nephew to go off to a colored boy scout camp for a month. Rosamund slipped into the household gaps with an ease that astonished everyone.

"It's because I decided just to be myself and do the things I most voluntarily before I really had to do them," she told herself.

She looked after her father's comfort, she waited on her mother, she was firm with Cindy. She filled the house with flowers and made some experiments in rearrangement of furniture. "We have a real daughter," her mother said, coming down for the first time tm days later.

Rosamund went to few parties in that time, yet she saw Bill Howells constantly. He was at the house everyday and their friendship cemented itself. It was therefore? amazing to Rosamund to have him stammer one night that h e loved her. Yet it was natural too, like growing, not an earthquake of emotion.

His arms were steady around her.

How lovely and right it all seemed, how ordinary. If you like, thought Rosamund in the instant before she lifted her face to his.

Later she asked the age-old question and it took her years to make Bill understand why she shouted with laughter at his answer.

"Why," asked Rosamund, "Do you love me?"

"Because," said Bill, "You're so different from all the other girls."

Plans for Dark Tobacco Loans

Loans on dark tobacco are available in 1940, they will not be made on tobacco produced on farms on which AAA acreage allotments are not exceeded, according to information received from the Agricultural Adjustment Administration today by S. K. Cassell, state executive officer.

This information was released in response to producers' reports that some growers in the dark tobacco area are planning to increase their acreage of tobacco with the expectation that loans will be available to both cooperating and non cooperating growers, as was the case last year.

According to a statement from J. B. Hutson, assistant administrator of the AAA Farm Program, "The question as to whether any loan will be made and as to the rate of the loan will depend, of course, upon conditions when the crop comes to market. The loans in recent years have meant better prices for farmers than they would have received otherwise. If there is a large crop in 1940 it is doubtful that the loans will prevent a decline in prices, and there would seem to be no justification under such conditions for continuing to make loans to non cooperating producers."

Mr. Cassell points out that the present relatively good balance between supply and demand for dark tobacco can easily be upset if the 1940 crop is increased over the 1939 crop. With uncertain export demand because of the war, a large crop might seriously depress prices. Furthermore, excess production in any year not only reduces the price for that crop but also remains to depress prices for later crops until production is brought into line with trade needs.
